

[Caroline Duncan interviewing Brian Agar on April 19, 2010]

00:00Caroline Duncan: ... [inaudible] Sorry, can you say your name again?

Brian Agar: I'm Brian Agar. I joined in 1961\ . I was in their centennial platoon for their 100th ... birthday. And, his father, was my drill instructor while I was going through depot training. After that, spent four years and then I got out. And, I went back home, Winnipeg, Manitoba, joined the Winnipeg police force and I did 29 years with the Winnipeg police department. And, that's about it.

Unknown speaker: [inaudible]

CD: And, where do you live now?

BA: Winnipeg.

CD: In Winnipeg. So, you've come out ... have you come out specifically for the [inaudible] celebrations.

BA: Yes. Well, I guess, especially him and I have been friends since years back and we found each other again as we worked in Canadian Blood Services together. So, we've got a rolling friendship.

CD: [inaudible] and it seems like ... a lot of the early friendships that people made in the Queen's Own in the 50s and the 60s, those friendships have endeared.

BA: It, it just carries on, like, you know the people when you were in and then you see them when you're out and it just rekindles the friendship again. Once you're in you never forget.

CD: Right. That seems to be the message I, I get from people, yeah.

BA: ... That's about it.

CD: Well, thanks for talking to me.

BA: Thank you.
